04NLM: WG 410 MP16 no.1 1970
Abstract: The purpose of this presentation is to demonstrate a surgical procedure for resecting an abdominal aortic aneurysm. Unlike most presentations which demonstrate surgical procedures, this film discusses preoperative and postoperative management in considerable detail. The program emphasizes that the symptoms for this condition can present in a variety of ways and that the simple direct lateral film of the abdomen is the most valuable diagnostic test. The film utilizes a case study of a 67-year-old man who presents with a pulsatile mass in the abdomen which is larger than five centimeters in diameter. The surgical procedure consists of the following main steps. The neck of the aneurysm and the two iliac arteries are dissected free and taped. A Dacron graft is then anastomosed between the aorta and the iliac arteries. Surgical areas of potential technical difficulty are discussed in considerable detail.

Abstract: (Critical) This program presents a review of neonatal resuscitation including the techniques of clearing of the airway, ventilation, intubation and external cardiac massage. Although the presentation is well done, some deficiencies exist including a failure to describe resuscitative procedures for the categories of depressed babies, and some outdated techniques are presented. Thus, this program is recommended with reservations for neonatologists, inhalation therapists, and pediatric nurses.

Abstract: This presentation uses a prosected cadaver to describe and demonstrate step-by-step the dissection of the retropharyngeal region. In a previous dissection the calvarium and brain had been removed. A saw is used to cut the edge of the calvarium to the foramen magnum just posterior to the mastoid foramen. A wedge of bone is lifted out of the way. A chisel is then used to intersect the previous cut in the midline.

The cadaver is placed in the supine position and the anterior part of the skull is reflected away. A scalpel and blunt dissection are used to complete the dissection. The rami are then cut above the semilunar space. The nerves, blood vessels, and muscles in the area are identified. A midline incision is made and the pharyngeal wall is viewed. Another saw cut is made in the midline through the skull which passes on the distal side of the nasal septum. The nasal features of the nasopharynx are then identified. The tonsillar pits are removed next with a scalpel. The levator palate is then transected.

Abstract: (Critical) This module, part of a slide atlas of cardiology, is an overview of rheumatic mitral valve disease. Associated pathology, radiology, echocardiography and electrocardiography are discussed. These slides are of good quality and provide effective support material for instruction on rheumatic heart disease. The omission of two-dimensional echocardiography dates the program somewhat. The program is recommended to be available for use in a medical school's departments of medicine, pediatrics, surgery and/or pathology.

Abstract: (Producer) This series of four films emphasizes the many advantages of Right-Angle, Parallel-Plane, Intra-Oral Radiography. These programs describe clinical procedures which utilize the Versatile Intra-Oral Positioner to facilitate the production of accurate radiographs in a simplified and standardized method. Part One illustrates how the right-angle, parallel plane technique minimizes dimensional distortion and how use of the V.I.P. instrument prevents elongation, shortening, and/or overlapping. Part Two shows the use of the Versatile Intra-Oral Positioner to radiograph the anterior teeth.

The V.I.P. instrument simplifies placement of the film parallel to the long axes of the anterior teeth. It also facilities direction of the x-ray beam at right angles to the radiographic film. Part Three illustrates how the right-angle, parallel-plane technique can be used in a simplified and standardized manner to produce intra-oral radiographs of the posterior teeth which exhibit maximum anatomic accuracy. Part Four demonstrates a method of 'bite-wing' radiography which positions the film vertically and provides adequate coverage of the height of the crest and the alveolar bone.

1. Bronchoscopy - slides 2. Fiber Optics - slides I. Zavala, Donald C. (Donald Charles), 1923- II. American College of Chest Physicians. III. Series

04NLM: WF 141 SC no.4 1976

Abstract: (Critical) This program distills the experience of a recognized authority in bronchoscopy to provide a concise description of the relative merits of rigid and fiberoptic bronchoscopy. The indications for bronchoscopy (rigid versus fiberoptic) and prerequisites in terms of facilities and personnel are explained; however, other than a brief description of insertion, practical application of the procedure is not detailed.

This is an unimaginative production, which makes poor use of the media and displays little advantage over written material. Recommended for limited use only, the material may be of interest to physicians and allied health personnel who are novices to the techniques of bronchoscopy, but is unlikely to have wider use or appeal.

04NLM: WG 550 SC no.3 1974

Abstract: (Producer) This program discusses heart disease and its occurrence and presents a possible means of therapy through the control of atherosclerosis. The presentation describes atherosclerosis and its effect on the body, identifies habits, conditions and traits known to increase the odds of developing the disease, and reviews the major risk factors, especially those such as cigarette smoking that may be treatable.

04NLM: WQ 225 VC no.5 1979
Abstract: (Critical) This module, one in a newborn series, is an overview of an approach to providing proper emotional support for the family mourning a perinatal death. The importance of listening and of dealing with one's own abhorrence of the subject are emphasized. The stages of mourning are outlined. Suggestions are made as to when to notify the parents and how to deal with parental reaction and disorientation. A follow-up interview schedule is presented. The information is generally accurate and standard, but some is specific to the area of production. The casual presentation and slangy terminology are distracting. The program is recommended with reservations for use.

- slides. I. Ferrari, Arnaldo. II. Title
04NLM: WI 520 SL no.3 1979
Abstract: (Critical) This program is a series of endoscopic slides of various forms of colonic pathology. Colonoscopic techniques such as polypectomy and brush cytology are demonstrated. Nonmedical descriptive terms are overused. The quality of the endoscopic slides is superb, but histopathological slides of the structures seen on endoscopy are omitted. The text could be more effectively replaced by a taped description of the different lesions. This is recommended for undergraduate medical students in gastroenterology or surgical electives as a review of different forms of colonic pathology.

Abstract: (Producer) This program proposes the premise that safety is simply a matter of vigilance. It examines the activities in laboratories, respiratory therapy, anesthesia, operating room, physical therapy, and occupational therapy. Accident hazards in each department are illustrated and suggestions for avoidance through constant vigilance are made. This material is designed for nursing students, personnel orientation, and as continuing education for nurses in clinical practice.

Abstract: (Critical) This program, part of a series of Famous Teachings in Modern Medicine, covers the state of the art in the evaluation of renal abnormalities by ultrasonography. Normal renal anatomy, variants, and pathologic conditions, and perirenal anatomy are illustrated. Correlation with more conventional modalities is not sufficiently covered. The educational objectives are clear and the design is good. The visual quality is excellent. Extensive knowledge of the subject is not assumed. This program is highly recommended for radiologists, and for medical specialists in the field of urologic surgery and nephrology.

Abstract: The purpose of this program is to demonstrate by means of interviews with six schizophrenic patients, two frequent behavioral characteristics associated with schizophrenia, namely thought disorders and social isolation. Excerpts from the six interviews are shown followed by a discussion of each patient given by Dr. James Ryan. The program is organized so that the first three patients display thought disorders and the second three show forms of social isolation. The first patient illustrated in this program is a 55–year–old woman who demonstrates bizarre ideas, a sense of worthlessness, and loosened associations. The next patient, a 55–year–old woman, shows disorganized thinking as evidenced by her loosened associations and rhyming based on the sounds of words alone, particularly with the letter 'k'. The third patient shown in this group is a 28–year–old woman who also demonstrates loosened associations, tangential thinking and delusions. Dr. Ryan suggests that this patient's tangential behavior may be a means of avoiding painful issues. At this stage of the program Dr. Ryan defines social isolation and presents patients who demonstrate this characteristic. The first interview illustrates a 30–year–old woman who describes a self imposed isolation in her room for a period of eighteen years. The next patient, an 18–year–old girl, describes partial maintenance of social relationships; she explains however that she prefers companionship with her dogs. The last patient shown in this program is a 25–year–old man who has withdrawn from social relationships. He describes this uneasiness as first being felt at age fourteen. A final summarization of the aspects of thought disorders and social isolation is given. Dr. Ryan suggests that these two aspects often occur together and may be mutually reinforcing.

Abstract: The purpose of this program is to demonstrate concepts in schizophrenic thought and language by presenting excerpts from interviews with schizophrenic patients along with definitions and descriptions of each concept. According to the catalog sheet accompanying it, this program is intended to serve as a self contained instrument for the purpose of raising questions for discussion. The program considers language to be the most pathognomonic aspect of schizophrenia. It is also mentioned that the idiosyncrasies of language associated with schizophrenia often reflect the result of social isolation. The concepts of schizophrenic language discussed and illustrated by patients in this program are: pseudoconversation with exegesis, perseveration, cipher or coding functions, distraction of listener attention, echolalia, alliteration, assonance, rhyming, repetition, rhetorical devices, poiesis, neologisms, concreteness, overgeneralization, irrelevance to ordinary situations, unlabelled metaphor, metonymy, orientation, overinclusiveness in categorization, asyndesis, paralogic, obscurity of associations, interpretation of fantasy, de–automatization, and associations at vulnerable points in language. The program asks whether the schizophrenic controls his language or whether the language controls him. The narrator, Dr. David Forrest, states his belief that schizophrenic language is highly controlled; and leaves the final answer to this question up to the viewer to decide.

Abstract: The purpose of this program is to demonstrate through closed circuit videotapes an actual group therapy session in a physician's office. The group selected included adults with a variety of emotional problems. During the interaction, most of the group members seemed to demonstrate an increase in insight into their problems as evidenced by their verbal and nonverbal communications. The program consists primarily of the group sessions. At different intervals, however, a narrator will interject comments and will discuss specific aspects of group therapy such as nonverbal communication, the use of art and music therapy in a group, and the need to stop fruitless monologue. The program also includes a brief discussion and demonstration of the use of group therapy in a multiple family session. Throughout the film, emphasis is placed on the advantages of group therapy as an effective means of helping individuals to meet their emotional needs.

Segmental bronchial resection in benign disease with preservation of lung function [motion picture]/ E. Stanley Crawford, Walter S. 04NLM: WF 500 MP16 no.2 1960

Abstract: This program demonstrates the surgical techniques used to restore normal lung function in cases of benign lesions of the major bronchus, namely, segmental bronchial resection and end-to-end anastomosis of the bronchial segments. Three clinical cases illustrate the pathological processes involved, the technical features of the procedure and the analysis of the results. The first clinical patient is a 19-year-old woman with a complete obstruction of the right main bronchus resulting in the total collapse of the right lung. Following a right thoracotomy incision through the fifth intercostal space, the pleura is incised and the right main bronchus is separated by sharp and blunt dissection. With the endotracheal tube in the left main bronchus, the right bronchus is encircled with a silk ligature, transected and the obstructed segment removed. Restoration of the bronchial continuity by means of an end-to-end anastomosis is then demonstrated diagrammatically and surgically. The second clinical case involves a 65-year-old woman with a tumor obstructing the left main bronchus. The same procedure is performed with an additional use of a noncrushing arterial clamp across the bronchus to prevent the escape of oxygen and other gases. The third clinical case is a 55-year-old woman whose preoperative bronchogram indicates a stricture of the left main bronchus. Local resection of the stricture, airway reconstruction, and preservation of the lung are then demonstrated.

Abstract: (Critical) This module, part of a newborn series, discusses seizures and the importance of understanding them. Subleties which complicate diagnosis are described and recognition of various types is explained. Major etiologies are covered, evaluation priorities are specified, work-up is outlined, and therapy techniques are suggested. The material is very practical, accurate, and informative. Some comments and references are specific to the area of production, but overall the production is worthwhile. It is recommended for use.

Abstract: (Critical) This three part module consists of an introduction and seven reports on topics related to family nursing practice. The research varies considerably in quality and clarity for a study design on the findings of a completed pilot study. For the most part, supplementary reading is provided. Such topics are considered as, cooperation in family health care, the nursing construct, parent-child relationships, anxiety and tension management in families, sexual attitudes in families, and diabetic children. The program is recommended with reservations; it is of limited value to general audiences, but may be of interest to researchers and graduate students.

Abstract: (Critical) This program, in the forum of a group discussion between health care professional and disabled persons, considered the sexual needs of the handicapped. A sexuality class for blind youths using both plastic and live models is presented and the interaction between handicapped individuals is portrayed. Techniques for encouraging complete sexual development in the handicapped are suggested. Attitudinal problems are considered in discussions which confront beginning and advanced human sexuality specialists with realities of sexual expression as experienced by handicapped men and women. Some of the language has negative connotations and some of the terminology is incorrect. The use of explict nudity does not detract from the educational impact. This program is recommended for use.

Abstract: (Critical) An extensive analysis of the clinical significance and principles involved in taking a sexual history precedes a demonstration of the technique via two simulated interviews with female patients. The interview process, particularly the interviewer's comfort and style, is emphasized above its content, and rationale for a thorough inquiry is provided. The presentation is excessively slow and lengthy, with little continuity from one item to the next. While the content is accurate, as far as it goes, it lacks specificity on actual history taking, and possibly misleading distortion results from the omission of information. For students concerned with the evaluation and treatment of sexual dysfunction, the program is recommended with reservations.

Abstract: (Critical) This program discusses patients' reactions to spinal cord injury with an emphasis on sexuality. An injured man and his wife are interviewed by a psychologist concerning their post-accident sexual activity. The ensuing fears, miscommunications, and frustrations are detailed, effects of heavy medication are described, and anxiety resulting from an inability to experience orgasm is discussed. Specific techniques are outlined which professionals provided the couple to alleviate stress and overcome obstacles. The material is very slowly paced, and the portrayal of only one couple minimizes its usefulness. It is recommended for limited use only.

Abstract: (Critical) This program is an overview of tuberculosis, including its history, modes of transmission, pathology, clinical manifestations, bacteriology, immunology, radiologic appearance, and treatment. Basic terminology is defined, prevalence statistics are cited, and portals of entry and factors contributing to dissemination are identified. The wide range of coverage encompasses the course of the infection, testing, and its classifications. Despite its length, this production is well organized, consistent, and of sufficient depth to provide a comprehensive review of the subject. It is highly recommended as an update or review for medical students and physician.

04NLM: QZ 140 SC no.5 1980
Abstract: (Critical) This six part module reviews the definition and management of shock. The hemodynamics of perfusion, perfusion failure, cerebral perfusion failure, shock lung, volume repletion, and drug therapy are covered. The material is generally concisely presented, but too many slides were not labelled which made it difficult and tedious to follow. Many opinions were presented as fact and controversial areas were not specified as such. The classification is not one commonly seen, so close attention is necessary to follow the organization. This program is a worthy endeavor but it is recommended with reservations for use.

Abstract: (Critical) This program demonstrates the construction of single rotation flaps for correction of facial defects. The rationale and techniques are clearly depicted. Application of these procedures to defects other than the specified examples is not discussed, and follow-up photographs of the healed wound are not presented. The presentation is clear and concise; the photography is excellent and well illuminated; diagrams and drawings are effectively incorporated, but many shots are obscured by hands and the bright red fadeouts between sequences are distracting. This logical presentation, although too elementary for plastic surgeons, is highly recommended for general surgeons.

Abstract: The purpose of this presentation is to discuss and demonstrate the importance of 'sit-down dentistry' in prolonging the life expectancy and professional operating life of the dentist. This objective is achieved with the aid of a dentist, his assistant and several clinical subjects in simulated portrayals in which the practice of dentistry today and in the early part of this century are compared and contrasted using the dental exhibit at the Smithsonian Institution. In this presentation a dentist and an adult female visitor are shown at the Smithsonian Institution as they view the dental exhibit. The doctor's thoughts are overheard as he describes how much further advanced dentistry is as it is practiced today in his office. The program stresses that further advances are now possible by utilizing equipment, supplies and paraprofessional personnel trained in 'sit-down dentistry'. This equipment is then demonstrated, including a reclining chair for the comfort of the patient and the proper selection of stools to provide maximum comfort and efficiency for both the dentist and his assistant. The positioning of the equipment for maximum efficiency is discussed. The dentist then demonstrates the ease with which he achieves a direct approach to the four oral quadrants by altering the position of his stool.

Abstract: (Producer) This program discusses the application and contributions of electronmicroscopy to the study of both normal and pathological muscle. It reviews the technique of obtaining a sample of muscle for study with the electronmicroscope and discusses normal muscle ultrastructure and function. The program reviews pathological changes in muscle discernible at the ultrastructure level and mentions a few newer applications of electronmicroscopy to the study of neuromuscular diseases.

Abstract: (Producer) This module, part of a series of famous teachings in modern medicine, discussed the pathophysiology relationship shared by the skin and the gut. A discussion of genetic diseases that involve both organ systems covers the pattern of inheritance as well as the clinical aspect of the diseases. Dermal and gastrointestinal signs, symptoms, and clinical manifestations are also discussed and related pictorially and with diagnostic x-rays for nongenetic disorders which affect both organ systems. The locale, appearance, and characteristics of skin metastases secondary to gastrointestinal malignancies and nonspecific dermal lesions related to a variety of gastrointestinal diseases are reviewed.

Abstract: The purpose of this presentation is to discuss and demonstrate proven techniques in the use of free skin grafts. This objective is achieved in the demonstration of surgical procedures on six clinical patients. The importance of properly applied dressings to the grafted areas and the donor site is stressed. In the first case a burned, scarred, and contracted arm is repaired with a mixture of local flaps, use of the web on both sides and fixed thickness skin grafts from the thigh. In the second case the fibrous dorsal surface of the hand is removed and the area covered with a thick split skin graft using a dermatome. In the third case the patient has an invasive basal cell carcinoma at the inner canthus of the right eye. The lesion is removed and the area covered with a full thickness supraclavicular graft. The fourth patient has cancer of the nose. The entire covering of the nose is removed and the area replaced with a free fixed split thickness graft taken from just beneath the breast. The fifth patient has cancerous radiation lesions of both hands. Split thickness grafts are taken to cover both hands in the same operation. The final patient has a cathode ray machine burn on the index finger which is repaired with a split thickness graft.

Abstract: This program demonstrates a bronchoplastic procedure used in combination with a lebectomy for the treatment of bronchogenic carcinoma. This objective is accomplished by means of pre- and postoperative radiographs, diagrams and detailed surgical illustration of a sleeve resection of the right main bronchus. The program emphasizes that this procedure preserves the middle and lower lobes of the lung. This patient is a 58-year-old man whose bronchoscopic examination and biopsy reveals a squamous cell carcinoma located at the orifice of the right upper lobe bronchus. The program shows the following surgical steps to resect the tumor: a right periscapular skin incision is made in the thoracic cavity, the fifth rib is resected, each stage of dissection is performed and a bronchial anastomosis is demonstrated. Precautions noted are: placement of guide sutures at the angles of the bronchus and the packing of a sponge into the bronchus to minimize loss of anesthesia mixutre and to maintain interbronchial pressure during the operation. At the completion of the anastomosis, irrigation shows the closure to be airtight, and the lobectomy is completed.

Abstract: (Critical) This program reproduces the illustrations published in a color atlas of cytology, histology and microscopic anatomy. The collection of slides covers general cytology and systemic histology. The program is not useful for self-instruction. The slides are unlabelled which allows for some diversification of use especially in conjunction with a lecture or for testing purposes. Visual quality is inconsistent: some anatomical systems are clearer than others, the electron micrographs are superior to light micrographs, and the camera lucida drawings are a poor, too frequently used substitution for photographs. The scope of the program is good. This is recommneded with reservations for use.

Abstract: (Producer) This module, part of a interdisciplinary glossary of terms series, is an overview of the terminology and practice of social work. Terminology is defined, procedures are explained and demonstrated, and the goals and roles of the social worker are discussed. A case history of the family of a four-year-old child with developmental disabilities is presented. Cartoons, photographs, and diagrams are integrated to illustrate the material. The Meyer Children's Rehabilitation Institute's system for intake, programming, training for graduate students is featured.

Abstract: (Critical) This module reviews the basic aspects of sickle disease. The structural abnormality of hemoglobin S, the molecular mechanisms of sickling, the genetics of the condition, major clinical aspects, diagnostic laboratory tests, and briefly, and generally, management, are among the topics discussed. Most of the organ systems that suffer from the ravages of sickle cell disease are listed, with the exception of the central nervous system. The information is presented in a clear, orderly fashion. By and large, the slides are of excellent quality, with a few exceptions. Some errors and omissions are noted, and the pace may be too rapid for easy assimilation. Overall, however, this program is worthwhile and is recommended for medical students and residents, physicians practicing internal medicine, hematology, laboratory medicine, nursing and laboratory personnel connected with this disease.

Abstract (Critical) This program presents an informal discussion of current attitudes about sexuality and sex education To a lesser extent, sex therapy is also considered, but neither it nor sex education is covered in a comprehensive or orderly manner Sexuality is discussed in its broadest context — as an important aspect of personhood The unfulfilled objective of providing an overview of the topic as preparation and training of people in the helping professions is not expressed until late in the program The slow, uneven presentation does not appear to have been scripted or edited, and fails to develop in a meaningful way Other than the display of references on the screen, the material is not well visualized For example, the camera focuses on the listener rather than the speaker Strong aspects of the program include the speaker, Dr Mary Calderone, a thoughtful, articulate leader in the area of sex education, and the emphasis placed on the parental role in a child's sex education This program is of little substance and is too general for use in a professional setting, it is recommended with reservations for limited use only It may be useful for general sex education

1. Stomach - anatomy & histology - slides I. Cutts, J. Harry. II. University of Missouri--Columbia. Medical Center. Educational Resources Group.
04NLM: WI 300 SC no.1 1970
Abstract: This program describes and illustrates, primarily with drawings, the macroscopic and microscopic features of the stomach. The first part of the program provides a gross description of the stomach. A view of the abdominal viscera in situ is provided first. Then the relationship of the stomach to other organs is illustrated both diagrammatically and radiographically. The parts of the stomach are also identified. The arterial and venous supply of the stomach are then described in considerable detail. The second portion of the program discusses the histology of the stomach. This discussion covers the rugae, four layers of the stomach, the layers of the mucosa, the glands in the lamina propria including the cardiac, fundic and pyloric glands, and intracellular canaliculi, the smooth muscle, and the sphincter. Diagrams and photomicrographs are used in this discussion.

04NLM: WY 105 VC no.3 1979
Abstract: (Critical) This program presents three vignettes which illustrate the attributes of collaboration with other health care workers, clients, and families. Collaboration, cooperation, competition, and compromise are differentiated and dependent and independent roles of the nurse are described. The vignettes demonstrate the contributions of each person involved and discusses how to promote collaboration. Two instructors debate the value of each vignette. The accompanying manual provides objectives, pre- and post-viewing activities, and a bibliography. This material reflects current issues in nursing, if somewhat superficially. It is recommended for nurses at all levels of education.

04NLM: WY 105 VC no.9 1977
Abstract: (Producer) This program considers confrontation a valuable dimension of leadership. Specific strategies for use in confrontation are discussed and illustrated in three vignettes, including focusing clearly on the issue, being prepared to discuss the issue, planning the moves, and remaining on a cognitive level. The development of different styles of confrontation and attitudes toward this process are explored.

04NLM: WI 600 SC no.2 1980
Abstract: (Critical) This program reviews the normal anatomy and elimination process and discusses the pathophysiology of bowel and bladder incontinence. An overview of management strategies is presented, including physical activity, fluid intake, timing, diet, suppositories, massage, laxatives, enemas, and catheterization. Some of the material is described in simplistic, lay terminology. The controversy surrounding some measures, and the necessary precautions are not covered. The material is logically sequenced and the visualization is good; the narration is clear and well paced, but the audio synchronization was off. This program is recommended as an overview for nurses in undergraduate and pre-service programs and for physical and occupational therapists in rehabilitation.

Abstract: (Critical) This program illustrates cell microstructure and specialized cells and tissues. Electron micrographs of outstanding visual quality are displayed. Their resolution and staining are exact; however, the legends are hard to read when white lettering is used on electronlucent areas. The production lacks cohesion, organization, and the support of an accompanying text. Although the slides are spectacular, they are useless unless the viewer is familiar with electromicrograph ultrastructure or the module is used as an adjunct to a personal lecture. As such, this program is recommended for use.

Abstract: (Producer) This program shows an animation of the left heart demonstrating sub-valvular aortic stenosis of moderate severity, with synchronised sounds and murmurs and simultaneous display of sound notation and pressure curves. It explains the events taking place during a single cardiac cycle, demonstrating in turn the generation of the fourth sound, the mitral component of the first sound, the ejection systolic murmur and the aortic component of the second sound. It shows repeatedly the cycle of the left heart, first slowed down and then at a normal speed. It shows animation of the left and right heart demonstrating supravalvular aortic stenosis of moderate severity, with synchronised sounds and murmurs and simultaneous display of sound notation and pressure curves. It then shows the cycle repeated at a normal speed.

Abstract: (Producer) This seventeen minute program is comprised of sixteen vignettes which might typically be encountered by a middle level manager in a human service agency. Professional actors are used to lend a high degree of realism to these vignettes. The minimum of background information is provided, and no solutions are provided. As a teaching medium, these must be accompanied with other kinds of instruction. They are suited as accompaniments to group discussion and individual or group role play exercises.

Abstract: (Critical) This module, part of a series on the neurologically disabled patient. Reviews patient outcomes of acute care nursing, namely intact skin, normal range of joint motion, maintenance of adequate weight, skin turgor, and output, prevention of fecal impaction, and adequate sleep and rest. There are excellent demonstrations of body positioning, range of motion exercises, and patient feeding techniques. Two nurse-patient interactions illustrate effective approaches to managing hostile and aggressive patient behavior. An excellent segment describes the criteria for transfer of a patient to a rehabilitation setting, and a nurse-patient-wife conference regarding the preparation for such a transfer. This clear, well designed program is highly recommended for use.

Abstract: (Producer) This program shows an animation of the left heart demonstrating supravalvular aortic stenosis of moderate severity, with synchronized sounds and murmurs and simultaneous display of sound notation and pressure curves. It explains the events taking place during a single cardiac cycle, demonstrating in turn the generation of the fourth sound, the mitral component of the first sound, the ejection systolic murmur and the aortic component of the second sound. It shows repeatedly the cycle of the left heart, first slowed down and then at a normal speed. It shows animation of the left and right heart demonstrating supravalvular aortic stenosis of moderate severity, with synchronised sounds and murmurs and simultaneous display of sound notation and pressure curves. It then shows the cycle repeatedly at a normal speed.

1. Abdominal Wall - anatomy & histology - motion pictures I. Krantz, Kermit E. II. Eaton Laboratories. III. Title: Anterior abdominal wall [Motion picture]
04NLM: WI 900 VC no.13 1969

Abstract: The purpose of this program is to describe and illustrate the structures which are encountered in four incisions made into the anterior abdominal wall. This objective is achieved with the use of medical illustrations, diagrams, animation and cadaver dissection. The structures encountered in these four incisions, the midline, Pfannenstiel, pararectus and McBurney incisions, are described and illustrated in detail. The film also includes descriptions of the advantages and disadvantages of each incision. The anterior abdominal wall is noted to lie between the thoracic and pelvic regions. For purposes of describing and locating abdominal masses and viscera, it is divided into nine regions: umbilical, epigastric, hypogastric, right and left hypochondriac, right and left lumbar and right and left iliac regions. The film also identifies the muscular wall supporting the abdominal viscera and its four pairs of muscles: the rectus abdominus, the external oblique, the internal oblique and the transversus. The aponeuroses, nerve and blood supply of each are also described and illustrated in detail. Three of the major landmarks, the umbilicus, the anterior superior iliac spine and the rectus abdominus muscle, used in abdominal surgery are also identified.

04NLM: WV 201 VC no.11 1976

Abstract: (Critical) This program presents temporal bone anatomy from several approaches: lateral, superior, and posterior approaches to the vital structures within the temporal bone. Anatomical variations and landmarks for locating and identifying these structures are presented. The material is oriented to clinical application. The presentation is straightforward and informative, but the visual quality is confusing. Some parochial terminology is used without definition. A range of audiences would benefit from this information. The program is highly recommended for use.

Abstract: (Producer) This film explains the procedures involved in the surgical elimination of periodontal pockets for a patient with overall horizontal bone loss, interproximal bone craters, and deep interproximal pockets. Techniques demonstrated include the principles of flap design, tissue removal, planing of the exposed root surfaces, bone recontouring, and flap re-adaptation. A periodontal dressing maintains the flaps in position and protects the areas of denuded bone interproximally which are not covered by the flap. Favorable results are seen one week post-operatively and six months later.

04NLM: WJ 368 MP16 no.1 1969
Abstract: The purpose of this presentation is to describe and demonstrate surgical techniques which have been developed through experience in treating over 200 cases of renal trauma. This objective is achieved with the aid of radiographs, diagrams, and animation in addition to scenes from the surgical procedures. According to this program, these techniques significantly reduce the incidence of nephrectomy for hemorrhage control, postoperative perinephritic abscess, and secondary bleeding. In this presentation, the important steps in these repairs are noted to be the initial control of renal vessels to prevent serious hemorrhage when perirenal tamponade is released and provide an operative field free of hemorrhage, debridement of all devitalized tissue to prevent postoperative sloughing, meticulous hemostasis, and repair by either primary approximation of the remaining healthy tissue or placement of viable fat tissue or peritoneum in the debrided defect. In the first cases presented, the control of the right renal vessels by means of bulldog clamps is demonstrated. Then mobilization and occlusion of the left renal artery and vein are demonstrated. In the third case, the surgical repair of a gunshot wound to the left abdomen is demonstrated on a 32-year-old female. The left renal vessels are occluded, the devitalized tissue is debrided, and a free graft of peritoneum is used to cover the defect in the kidney. In the fourth case, an 18 year old male with a large laceration of the inferior and medial aspect of the left kidney is treated by partial nephrectomy, and the amputated kidney is covered with renal capsule. Several other cases are demonstrated using bolsters of fat and a live fat pedicle.

04NLM: WO 185 VC no.1 1980
Abstract: (Critical) This module, one in a hospital infection control series, is an overview of the principal factors that influence postoperative wound infection. The pathogens and physical attributes which predispose the surgical patient to the acquisition of infection are identified and modes of transmission are discussed. Standard surgical wounds are classified. The information is accurate, logical, and clear, but incomplete and of inadequate depth. The technical quality is excellent, but the illustration does not dramatically enhance the instructional quality. This program is recommended for somewhat unsophisticated audiences of medical students, surgical interns, or surgical nurses.

Abstract: (Critical) This program provides broad coverage of interaction between majority and minority groups. Attitudes and behaviors of each group are contrasted. Tensions and problems which arise, regardless of the distinguishing features, are considered. The use of animated abstract figures to illustrate the group dynamic may seem too impersonal to be emotionally or intellectually stimulating, however, they may serve as a neutral basis for discussion. The accompanying manual suggests uses of the module and stimuli for further discussion of related issues. The technical quality is clear, simplistic, well organized. The program is recommended for audiences of various levels of sophistication.

Abstract: This program describes and demonstrates, surgically, trapezoidal 28 hip joint replacement. The prosthesis used consists of a stainless steel femoral hip component on an ultra high molecular polyethylene socket designed to provide maximum flexion, rotation and extension with good stability. The surgical procedure is demonstrated on a 76 year old woman who has bilateral osteoarthritis. During surgery the hip is approached laterally with the operator posterior to the patient. A curvilinear incision is used. The capsule of the femoral neck is incised and a Gigli's wire saw is used to divide the greater trochanter at its base. The femoral head is dislocated. Stab incisions are made in the acetabular region for the fixation points and four holes are placed. The position of these fixation holes in the acetabulum is shown diagrammatically. Methyl methacrylate is used to fix the prosthesis. Techniques for correctly seating the prosthesis are demonstrated. Criss cross trochanteric wires are used. The vertical wire pulls the trochanter into the proper position while the horizontal wire holds the vertical tight. Diagrams are used to illustrate the position of the wires prior to tightening. The ends of the wires are tied with square knots. The patient had two total hip replacements three weeks apart. She is shown three months postoperatively walking with the aid of canes with little apparent difficulty.

Abstract: Teaching Basic Burn Care is designed for use as a companion to Nursing the Burned Patient and Procedures for Nursing the Burned Patient. Teaching guides for 20 days of instruction for all levels of burn care personnel in basic burn care provide a teaching outline, the objectives for each topic, suggested learning experiences, the projected time period for the learning experience, along with suggested audiovisual aids, and reading lists. Forty teaching slides which show clinical examples and further delineate the principles of effective burn care are included with detailed written scripts on the contents of each slide. Proficiency exams for pre- and post-lecture assessment are provided.

04NLM: WP 468 VC no.3 1962

Abstract: The purpose of this program is to present, with the aid of diagrams, the surgical procedure for total abdominal hysterectomy. As stated in the program, the emphasis is not on the technical details, but on the 'safe routine methods of identifying, visualizing and when necessary, mobilizing contiguous structures such as the bladder, ureters and rectum during all pelvic operations.' The program begins with an introductory discussion by two physicians of the effects of poorly planned abdominal incisions and the method they developed for preventing injury to the ureters and bladder. The surgical procedure is then demonstrated in a step-by-step fashion on a patient whose right tube and ovary were previously removed. This procedure consists of the following: midline incision, opening of the right and left broad ligaments, freeing the bladder laterally from the uterus, displacing the tissue from the cervix, forming a vaginal cuff and closing the area. During all phases of the operation, the program identifies the location of the ureters and bladder and emphasizes care in cutting and suturing nearby areas. The second section of the program discusses the frequency of posthysterectomy enterocele. The program notes that the enterocele occasionally develops in a patient following an abdominal hysterectomy as in this case. The surgical procedure to repair the enterocele is then demonstrated both surgically and diagrammatically. The major steps in this procedure include an equidistant incision between the rectum and the posterior vaginal wall, placement of a retractor in the vagina, excision of a wide wedge from the posterior vaginal wall and closure.

Audience level: --Allied health: graduate. --Dental: undergraduate; graduate; continuing education. --*Medical: undergraduate; graduate; continuing education. --Nursing: graduate. --Specialty: anatomy, pathology, histology, embryology. Rating: Highly recommended. Review date: Dec. 1980. Reviewer: Association of American Medical Colleges (AAMC). Learning method: Support.
1. Histology - slides 2. Microscopy, Electron, Scanning - slides I. Kardon, Randy H., 1954- II. Kessel, Richard G., 1931-
04NLM: QS 532 SL no.2 1980
Abstract: (Critical) This module is a comprehensive illustration of the scanning microscopic appearance of cells and tissues of the body. Three dimensional features of intra-, inter-, and extracellular structures and their relationships are portrayed at different levels of magnification and are compared with transmission and light microscopic appearances. Casts of the vascular and microvascular supply of numerous organs are examined. The heart, nerve-skeletal muscles relations, intracellular organelles are not included, and information, such as that on the ventricular system of the brain, is not up to date. The quality of the slides and text are very good, but some slides contain too much minute detail, and an overall index and specific identification would be helpful. This program is highly recommended to supplement course work in histology, gross anatomy, and embryology.

04NLM: WI 200 VC no.2 1972
Abstract: This program describes and demonstrates on a prosected cadaver the dissection of the floor of the tongue. Before beginning the dissection, the structures in the suprahyoid region are reviewed. The course of the facial artery is traced and the dorsal surface of the tongue is examined. An incision is then made through the mucous membrane of the floor of the mouth between the tongue and the internal surface of the mandible. The position of the styloglossus muscle is noted as is the duct of the submandibular gland. The position of the lingual nerve is indicated as is the submandibular ganglion and the other extrinsic muscles of the tongue. The points of origin and attachment of these muscles are noted. The other salivary glands are also described. The nerve supply of the tongue is reviewed.

04NLM: WU 270 VC no.4 1975
Abstract: (Critical) This program evaluates techniques of enhancing the tooth's natural resistance to dental caries. Various methods of employing flouride are compared, such as professional application, public health strategies, and self-application. Animal experimentation at NIH is reviewed. Topical and systemic effects are not differentiated. This information is somewhat out of date and is not sufficiently substantive for dental students. The program is recommended with reservations as an introduction to the topic or for use in allied health professions.

04NLM: WO 704 FC no.2 1977
Abstract: (Producer) This program is an overview of the topical treatment of burns. After discussing the methods used to determine the depth and extent of burn injury, this program presents burns, including first, second, and third degree burns, partial and full-thickness burns. The use of silver sulfadiazine, the most feasible agent currently used for the prophylactic and therapeutic management of post-burn infection, is discussed. Actual case studies are presented to demonstrate the use of temporary grafts, homografts, xenografts, synthetic grafts, and permanent autografts. This material is appropriate for nursing students, for personnel orientation, and for continuing education of nurses in clinical practice.

04NLM: WO 680 SC no.2 1980
Abstract: (Critical) This two part module is a comprehensive detailed discussion of the principles of transplantation immunology. The structure and relevance of HLA antigens, the histopathology of graft rejection, the types of graft rejection phenomena, the diagnosis and treatment of kidney allograft rejection, and experimental aspects of allotransplantation are covered. The gross appearance of the kidney is compared with the rejected specimen, but comparisons are made neither at the histology level nor between normal and pathologic tissues. Although the histopathology of organ allograft, particularly kidney rejection, is emphasized, most of these slides are of inferior technical quality. Some slides are displayed much too rapidly for comprehension, some are poorly narrated, and more specific explanations are necessary. The use of blood transfusion to prolong allograft survival should be discussed. This program is recommended for use with a qualified instructor.

Abstract: (Critical) Definitions and differential diagnosis of transsexualism and transvestism are presented in this unit. A clinical approach, which features comprehensive evaluation and management of the transsexual or transvestite from a supportive viewpoint, encouraging a continuation of the patient's cross-gender behavior is described. No consideration of any other theoretical approach to the understanding and treatment of these conditions is apparent. The psychopathology and psychodynamics underlying the difficulties are minimized. While interesting, this is an unstructured and excessively lengthy production. It is recommended with reservations for the use of the clinical trainee or practitioner in the fields of psychology, psychiatry, and social work.

Abstract: (Critical) This module, one in a series of forensic medicine teaching programs, discusses the handgun and demonstrates its construction, mechanism of fire and wounding power. Entrance, exit, and skull wound are covered, as are pathways through the body, complications of gunshot wounds, and shot gun wounds. The information is concise and lucide. Bodies in the morgue of the Chief Medical Examiner's Office of New York City are used to illustrate the narrative. The importance of careful handling of the recovered bullet is emphasized. This excellent program, although too basic for the forensic pathology resident, is highly recommended for the general pathology resident or the practicing pathologist.

Abstract: (Producer) This four part module, part of a series on forensic medicine, discusses traumatic injuries. Cutting, stabbing, and chopping are defined by the forensic pathologist and two types of sharp force wounds, puncture and incision, are discussed. Step-by-step procedures used to examine wound victims and record the information are described. Weapons used to cause the wounds, estimation of the amount of force exerted, and the determination of ante or post mortem wounds and suicidal or homicidal wounds are discussed. Examples are provided of razor, ax, meat cleaver, and machete wounds. Blunt force injuries, including these caused by vehicle accidents are illustrated by way of an exterior head autopsy performed on a victim of a blunt force injury. Injuries caused by moving vehicles are described, including patterns of injuries, how and where the body was hit, and how to determine if it was thrown. Thermal injuries from flames, hot vapors, or scalding water and methods for determining death are covered. Different types of electrical deaths and effects of electricity on the body are exemplified. This material is intended for the use of first and second year medical students.

Abstract: The purpose of this program is to discuss the treatment of Parkinsonism with Levodopa. The program begins with a brief description of the historical development and symptoms associated with this condition. Next, the presentation discusses the milestones in determining the clinical importance of dopamine in the brain and the use of Levodopa in Parkinsonism. The program includes the dosage, and states that the 'long term efficacy and safety has not been extablished and that the peak dosage should not exceed five to six grams per day'. The program discusses in considerable detail the contraindications for the drug and the side effects which sometimes occur in patients, i.e., nausea, psychic manifestations, abnormal movements, orthostatic hypotension, decreased white blood count. Often, are illustrated. The program states that there is 'no evidence that levodopa alters the cause of the disease'.

Abstract: (Critical) This module, volume 19 of a cardiology slide atlas, presents the clinicopathological correlation of congenital and acquired tricuspid valve disease. A background knowledge of cardiology or basic cardiovascular surgery will facilitate understanding of the material; however, the production beautifully illustrates anatomical abnormalities which are otherwise difficult to comprehend. It is highly recommended for use.

Abstract: This program is composed of several episodes which demonstrate some of the criteria of emotionally disturbed behavior. The examples include the following behaviors: violent outbursts, anxiety about bodily injury, self-destructiveness, suspiciousness, clinging to rigid behavior patterns, poor tolerance for frustration, and running away. The program was filmed at a non-profit treatment camp for boys between the ages of 9 and 15. Showing a broad range of maladaptive behaviors, it reveals the fears and feelings of the campers.

Abstract: (Critical) This program, part of a slide atlas of cardiology, discusses truncus arteriosus. Pathologic, radiologic, echocardiographic, and electrocardiographic aspects are presented. The inclusion of physiology, incidence data, prognosis and therapeutic options would enhance the educational value of this program. Although it is rapidly becoming both more precise and more available, two-dimensional echocardiography is not featured. This program is recommended with reservations for use as support for instruction on this topic in medicine, pediatrics, surgery or pathology.

1. Tuberculin Test - motion pictures I. Lederle Laboratories

04NLM: WF 250 MP16 no.1 1964

Abstract: This program demonstrates the technique for applying the tuberculin tine test and discusses its advantages. Initially, the disposable equipment used to administer the test, namely, the disc and its four tines, and plastic handle, is described. The step-by-step procedure used to administer the test is then demonstrated. Criteria used to determine whether or not the reaction to the test is positive or negative are discussed. Advantages cited for the tuberculin tine test include a minimum amount of equipment, inexpensive cost, ease of application, and reduction of fears present when tests are administered by a needle.

Abstract: (Critical) This program is a detailed overview of tubule interstitial diseases of the kidney. The etiology, pathophysiology and anatomy are discussed, with comparison to glomerular diseases and emphasis on scleroderma and anyloid. Differential diagnoses of particular disease entities are not discussed and neither the role of renal biopsy nor a correlation with eosinophilia is covered. Some slides are out of focus or too busy, and graphs tend to be complex, while the vocabulary is oversimplified. This program is recommended for medical students, residents and, possibly, for an advanced nursing curriculum.

Abstract: (Critical) This program covers primary tumors of the nervous system, pituitary and meninges. It alludes to, but does not cover, tumors of extraneural origin which involve the nervous system. It includes experimental neuropathology, presenting a series of demonstrations of tissue culture approaches to the study of central nervous system neoplasia and a brief review of experimental oncogenesis in the central nervous system. The technical quality of the material is excellent, as is the organization. The narrative is clear and the program can be self paced. This program, which is particularly useful as a review of the subject, is considered by the reviewer to be one of the highest quality teaching aids of its form.

04NLM: WV 230 SC no.1 1973
Abstract: (Critical) This program presents a concise view of the anatomy of the middle ear, balanced by a discussion of a clinical procedure. Each wall of cavity is depicted as part of a box. The walls, roof, and floor are viewed separately and prominent landmarks are pointed out. The positions of important structures within or adjacent to the middle ear are identified. The tympanic membrane is discussed in detail with special emphasis on endangered structures during myringotomy. The program suffers from a lack of individual slides for individual points. In some instances, structures are discussed which are not easy to identify. The function of the ear ossicles, stapedius, and tensor tympany is omitted.

Abstract: This program discusses and demonstrates, both diagrammatically and surgically, the intact canal wall technique of tympanoplasty and mastoidectomy. Emphasis is placed on demonstrating the anatomic aspects of the technique rather than the teaching of the operation itself. Drawings of the intact canal wall are presented and are discussed and the objective of the surgery identified. The objective is considered to be to remove without damage to the facial nerve a cholesteatoma from an attic perforation which has extended into the mastoid. The intact canal wall is preserved. The surgical procedure consists of the following steps: create incisions outlining the vascular strip between the tympanosquamous suture and the mastoid suture, elevate the strip, create a circumferential incision just external to the junction of the outer and middle third of the ear canal connecting the outermost portion of the two previous incisions, make a postauricular incision and turn the ear forward, remove temporalis fascia for grafting, place the vascular strip under the anterior blade of the retractor, thin the posterior bony wall, introduce plastic sheeting from the mastoid into the middle ear through the facial access, create an opening for the capitulum of the stapes to allow for reconstruction, and place a fascia graft on the outer surface of the remnants. Several cases are presented to show the surgical sequences involved. Additional cases are shown to illustrate the ear after a year or two. The use of Supramed in place of the plastic sheeting is discussed and demonstrated.

Abstract: (Critical) Using a three way interview format this program covers information on homosexuality. It deals with the myths about people who make sexual choices different from the norm and presents in a very palatable way a large research project dealing with various aspects of homosexuality. The discussion of homosexualtiy is both enlightening and palatable. Unfortunately, there is only passing comment to differentiate homosexualtiy from other issues such as transsexuality and transvestism. A brief discussion of these topics would help the listeners differentiate homosexuality from transsexualism which both involve a homosexual choice. The discussion is far ranging and covers many areas about which practitioners and health profession students probably hold myths. The program is highly recommended to augment a human sexual development course involving medical students, residents in family practice and psychiatry. It should also be useful for nurses working in these fields.

Abstract: (Critical) This module is a three-part demonstration of procedures for the measuring and recording of the active functional range of motion of various joints of the upper extremities. The effective sef-instructional format, accompanied by a manual and by pre- and post-tests, adequately meets the program's objectives. The depth of material on the substitutions which may interfere with valid range of motion measurement is variable and the description of axes location is somewhat vague. Appropriate and accurate content overall contributes to an efficient learning device for the student therapist; however, comprehension will be facilitated by an instructor's orientation and use of the recommended follow-up. The program is recommended for use.

Abstract: (Critical) This program presents slides of histologic sections accompanied by brief written descriptions to aid in the identification of normal urinary cytology and changes associated with non-neoplastic and neoplastic conditions. Non-neoplastic changes discussed are inclusions, inflammatory and degenerative changes, changes due to radiation and trauma, and alterations secondary to drugs. Histologic and cytologic slides of primary and secondary neoplasms involving the urinary tract are presented. Unfortunately, several minor flaws mar the program. The synonymous use of epithelium and carcinoma is confusing. The mixing of histologic types (grade) and invasiveness (stage) is stressed, but neither is adequately defined. The repetition relative to transitional carcinoma of the renal pelvis and urinary bladder is unneccessary. The presentation would be improved by the use of markers when the size of the cell is important, as well as by the use of split photo technique for cytology/histology comparisons.

04NLM: QY 185 SL no.2 1969
Abstract: This program discusses and demonstrates the evaluation of urinary sediments as a valuable diagnostic clue to both common and rare diseases. The urinary cast is considered as a valuable and readable message from the nephron which formed it. The examination of urinary sediments by microscope, phase contrast microscope, polarized microscope, special stains for the urine and ultraviolet microscopy is briefly described. The classification of the urinary casts and a list of other formed elements in the urine such as erythropoietic cells which can be found in the urine are presented. The diagnostic importance of the urine sediment is then outlined. Formed elements and their correlation with anatomical and physiological events in the nephron are then illustrated. The information regarding renal infections which can be obtained from observing and evaluating urinary sediments is included in this discussion. The significance of the presence of epithelial cells in the urine specimens of individuals with conditions as gouty nephropathy, acute poststreptococcal glomerulonephritis, the nephrotic syndrome and acute oliguric glomerulonephritis is then described. The diagnostic significance of the telescoped sediment and crystal formation, and the use of the urinary sediment as a clue to diagnosing the rejection reaction in patients receiving renal transplants are also described.

Abstract: This film demonstrates the surgical procedure to correct a 90 degree flexion contracture involving the proximal interphalangeal joint of the long finger by utilizing a skin graft taken from the plantar surface of the foot. This particular tissue is selected primarily to insure the best cosmetic effect by the color match and functional similarity of the two extremities. A skin graft is then taken from the groin to repair the defect made in the foot by the first stage of the surgical procedure. Range of motion is demonstrated preoperatively, during the surgical procedure and four and six weeks postoperatively. Marked functional and cosmetic improvement is noted with an excellent color match. This procedure is demonstrated on a patient who sustained a flame burn to two fingers three years previously and had received a split thickness graft several days after the injury. There was obvious functional impairment, cosmetic deformity and x-ray changes in the proximal and middle phalanges of the long finger. The surgical procedure consists of two stages. The first stage includes the excision of the scar tissue from the finger, removing a full thickness graft from the plantar surface of the foot and applying this graft to the finger surface. While this is being done, the second stage of the procedure is performed by a second operating team. This stage consists of taking a slant graft from the groin to apply to the defect in the foot.

Abstract: (Producer) The eradication of the deep fissures and grooves in posterior teeth for the prevention of caries can be accomplished through the use of plastic sealants. The method of using two sealants, one using ultraviolet light to bring about the polymerization, and the other which uses a chemical catalyst to convert the monomer, are described and demonstrated on typodont models.

Abstract: (Producer) This program was designed for all hospital employees and staff and for those students who are preparing to work in a hospital. This program explains fundamental principles of fighting fires and illustrates specific techniques in using fire extinguishers effectively. The classification of fires and labeling of fire extinguishers are briefly reviewed in the beginning of the program. Then step-by-step demonstrations are used to explain techniques for using the pressurized water extinguisher, the fire hose, the dry chemical extinguisher, and the carbon dioxide extinguisher. Safety precautions for the firefighter are emphasized throughout the program. This program is available in a wide range of formats from 35mm filmstrip through videocassette. It also contains preview and review exercises as part of the instructor's guide.

Abstract: (Critical) This module, part of a basic patient care series, discusses the purposes and demonstrates the step-by-step procedures for vaginal douche and perineal care. Prior knowledge of basic anatomy of the female genitalia is assumed. Equipment is described and indications for the procedure are reviewed. The information is acceptable, but slightly redundant. Narration is clear, and the terminology is easily understood, but the delivery is somewhat monotonous. An illustrated manual is included but diagrams of pertinent anatomical landmarks of the perineum would be helpful. No instructional objectives are specified, however, the material is well organized. It is recommended for nurses' aides, practical nurses, and beginning registered nurse students.

Abstract: The purpose of this presentation is to discuss and demonstrate the surgical technique for the removal of the uterus through the vaginal route. The advantages and indications for the vaginal hysterectomy as compared to the abdominal hysterectomy are discussed. The technique shown in this film was developed to make the operation simple, fast and easy by strict adherence to anatomical principles, by reducing the number of instruments and sutures and by restricting surgical manipulation. In this technique, as demonstrated in the presentation, the uterus is brought down with a Jacob's tenaculum and dissection then proceeds. The film notes that the operation cannot be done vaginally if the posterior cul-de-sac cannot be located. The uterus is bisected to facilitate the location of the pedicles. These pedicles are then marked with clamps for identification purposes and are later cut and tied in a Bar X Bar type of closure which strengthens the purse-string suture ligature used in the closure of the peritoneum.

Abstract: (Critical) This program presents an overview of pathologic entities of the esophagus and the stomach, in the context of clinical disease. Brief case reports are incorporated into the discussion of various lesions, with emphasis on their x-ray, gross, and histologic appearance. The technical quality of photomicrographs and gross specimens is excellent. The pathology is clearly identifiable and clinical/pathologic correlation is well-depicted. Guidance in terms of objectives, organization of the material, relative importance of subjects, and goals for outcome, is insufficient for independent learning. Instead, it is recommended for use as review or supplementary material.

Abstract: (Critical) This program discusses the use of cytologic examination and random biopsy in the diagnosis and follow-up of patients with transitional cell carcinoma of the bladder. A natural history of transitional cell carcinoma is reviewed in a somewhat abbreviated fashion. A basic knowledge of transitional cell carcinoma — its pathogenesis, and natural history. The slides and tape are generally clear, but the background colors may prove distracting. More emphasis should be placed on the value of cytologic specimens to the urologist and less on the actual laboratory processing. More slides depicting the actual lesions of transitional cell carcinoma which are visualized during cystoscopy would be helpful. The program is recommended for residents in urology training programs and for practicing urologists.

04NLM: WW 250 VC no.1 1979
Abstract: (Critical) This videotape is intended for graduates in medicine, specifically ophthalmology residents in training, fellows, and practicing opthalmologists. The basic subject is taught and practiced within all training programs. This presentation extends beyond the basic level of experience and practice to familiarize the viewer with more sophisticated techniques of biomicroscopic examination of the ocular vitreous structure and its pathophysiologic significance. The sequencing of the presentation is excellent as it is divided into three logical parts describing the technique, clinical findings and surgical considerations. The first of these sections, on technique, lends itself well the visual format, whereas the second and third sections, dealing with clinical findings and surgical aspects, are subtle and photograph poorly. In its present format, the clinical and surgical material is of varied quality. Some attempt is made to emphasize with pointer arrows, etc., however, this is infrequent and the correlation with the audio portion is vague. The second section (clinical findings) devolves into an enumeration of clinical entities, many rare, and little effort is made to provide a close association with the technique of vitreous biomicroscopy. Similarly, the third section (surgery) suffers from the limitations of presenting the material in video form and from tenuous association to biomicroscopic examination.

1. Spinal Diseases - diagnosis - slides 2. Thermography - slides I. Title.
04NLM: WE 725 SC no.7 1980
Abstract: (Producer) This program describes a process which uses a unique elastometric thermally sensitive film which can be readily contoured to display the thermovascular patterns of the body. A historical perspective is presented and the color scale is demonstrated and explained. Patient history and positioning, operative conditions, classic findings, interpretation and assessment of findings, and comparison to other physiologic tests are among the topics considered. Schematic representations of typical normal and abnormal thermographic patterns are presented. This material is appropriate to the viewer desiring to evaluate pain or to detect irritation or damage to a sensory nerve.

04NLM: WB 460 SC no.1 1978
Abstract: (Critical) This program demonstrates several methods of achieving pressure relief for wheelchair-bound patients with spinal cord injuries. Padding, inspection, and time maneuvers, implemented either independently or with assistance, are discussed. Neither ischial cutouts nor shear forces involved with sacral cutouts are mentioned. Differentiation in skin blanching to determine sitting tolerance levels is not adequately explained. Some slides are unclear or misleading and poor coordination in the signals for slide advancement is distracting. The instructional level is suitable to a range of rehabilitation workers, aides and assistants and the program is recommended for use provided supplemental instruction is available.

04NLM: BF 789.D4 VC no.21 1978
Abstract: (Producer) This program uses animation and mild black humor to telescope the anticipated reactions to imminent death. When meek-mannered Nesbitt Spoon learns he has only five minutes to live, he fitfully bounds through the expected emotional responses described by Dr. Elisabeth Kubler-Ross. Joking disbelief, then violent anger, give way to a desperate attempt at makeshift cryogenics, tears of self-pity, a halfhearted suicide attempt, and an ultimate resolution to make the most of each of his remaining 30 seconds. This production received a blue ribbon at the 1979 American Film Festival, first prize in the film essay category at the San Francisco International Film Festival, the Silver Cindy Award of the Information Film Producers of America, and the Special Jury Prize of the Ottawa International Animated Film Festival.

Abstract: (Critical) This videotapes presents an interesting dialogue between two famous American surgeons, William Longmire and Francis Moore. It is not an oral history interview, however, and the discussion focuses on selected aspects of their professional careers, rather than giving insights into their philosophical and ethical perspectives. A number of the significant changes in surgery and medical education are brought out in the discussion, particularly changes associated with new developments in intestinal, cardiovascular, and transplant surgery. Changes in medical education are also registered. This conversation should be of value to those interested in the history of surgery in the United States including some surgeons and some historians, but it has limited educational value.

Abstract: (Producer) This program, part of a series on famous teachings in modern medicine, discusses the science of identifying cellular components associated with neoplasms and the use of these tumor markers in monotoring treatment. The correlation between tumor associated markers and human malignancies is discussed. Numerous tumor markers, especially those in current use by clinicians and those in experimental stages that show promise for future use are discussed. Included are the oncofetal antigens (particularly alpha fetoprotein and carcinoembryonic antigen), cancer associated enzymes (such as lactate dehydrogenase and alkaline phosphotase), and the ectopic hormones (e.g., human chorionic gonadotropin and adrenocorticotropic hormone). The use of a number of antigen markers to produce radiolabeled monoclonal antibodies for the detection of primary or metastic malignancy by scintiphotography are covered.

04NLM: WY 160 VC no.11.5 1977
Abstract: (Critical) This module, one in a series on the neurologically disabled patient, discusses the procedure for admission of an aphasic patient to a rehabilitation setting. An admission interview conducted by a nurse with an aphasic patient and his wife illustrates important principles and techniques of communication and recognition of patient control of his care program. The problem of memory loss associated with brain damage is illustrated, reaction to changes in rehabilitative vs. acute care setting is featured, and therapeutic suggestions are made. A conference between nurse, social worker and speech therapist elaborates the concept of anxiety as central in physical disability. A major emphasis is on the family as an integral part of rehabilitation care. This clear, well designed program is highly recommended for baccalaureate nursing students and staff nurses.
